WAGES OF MECHANICS.

In the following tables are given the rates of wages paid to various classes of mechanics employed in the manufacturing and mining industries of the United States. The tables include the wages of engineers, blacksmiths, machinists, painters, carpenters, and common laborers. The figures are identical with those given against the corresponding titles in the tables preceding.

The present object is to group together for ready reference the rates of wages paid to those classes of mechanics which are common to so many industries, and which constitute, on the whole, a considerable percentage of the number of persons employed.

I am aware that in many cases any attempt at comparisons will simply result, as it frequently does in wages matters, in a comparison of names rather than of the rates paid men performing the same labor. A painter at one establishment, or in one industry, or in one section of the country, may be a common workman, engaged in the commonest employment incident to the trade, whereas in another schedule the painter whose wages are given may be a highly skilled workman, employed in an occupation requiring the utmost care and attention and the highest skill. The industry for which the wages are given will, however, in some instances indicate the character of the work done.
