MAP I. LIMITS OF THE UNITED STATES

AREAS OF THE UNITED STATES: 1940

INTRODUCTION

This report presents total, land, and water areas for the United States as of April 1, 1940. Area figures are shown for the States, counties, county subdivisions, incorporated places having 1,000 or more population, and the territories and possessions. These are entirely new determinations based upon the best available maps and in many instances, therefore, vary from previously published figures.

Historical development.— Area measurements in the United States began with measurements for the country as a whole and developed, as mapping progressed, to measurements for the States and, later, the counties. Until this decade, map construction in the United States was not sufficiently advanced to permit the measurement of the subdivisions of counties. Map development was retarded by vast stretches of unexplored land, and it was only through decades of effort by the U. S. General Land Office, the U. S. Geological Survey, the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the United States Army that fairly accurate and detailed cartographic maps were compiled.

Fragmentary references to the acreage of public lands surveyed and sold appeared in the annual reports of the U. S. General Land Office beginning with 1789. The annual report for 1850 contained the first reference to the areas of the several States and Territories, although there was no indication of the method used in obtaining these areas. The General Land Office was practically the sole source of information concerning the areas of the States and Territories until 1881. // Henry Gannett, Geographer for the Tenth Census, laid the foundation for accurate and detailed area measurement in the United States. His publication of 1881, "The Areas of the United States, the Several States and Territories, and Their Counties," marks the beginning of six decades of census work in supplying areas on a county basis. // In another way also the work of Gannett represents a landmark. For the first time an account is given of the method and maps employed, the water bodies included, and the outer limits of the United States used as a basis for measurement. Although this was the first publication of such a broad scope and detailed nature for the United States, areas for the subdivisions of the Russian Empire had been released by J. Strelbitsky as early as 1874, which areas were later reprinted in the monumental work, "La Superficie de l'Europe."

Considering the current status of the map record, the work of Gannett was of such a high order of accuracy that, except for minor alterations to conform to obvious State and county boundary changes, it held until the present decade. Revisions, restatements, and additions were made by Gannett in 1891 and 1901. Because of the variation in the Gannett figures of 1901 from a carefully prepared area statement released by the General Land Office in 1899, collaboration was undertaken by Henry Gannett, acting for the U. S. Geological Survey; C. S. Sloane, then Geographer of the Census; and Frank Bond, of the General Land Office; in an effort to reconcile these differences and a joint area statement was published in 1906. The differences between the tables of 1899 and 1901 were, for the most part, small and well within the limits of error for planimeter measurement. Certain variations, however, were considerable, resulting from differences in the maps used and the inclusion in one case and the exclusion in another of various embayments and coastal waters. In this joint statement, for the first time, the areas of the Great Lakes were given and credited to the several adjoining States. In harmony with the State totals shown in the report of this committee, revised land areas of the counties of the United States were published in the Decennial Census reports of 1910, 1920, and 1930.

The historical review of area measurements in the United States given in this report had its counterpart in other sections of the world.[1] The contributions of specialists in mathematical cartography both in the United States and abroad made possible many scientific advancements in this field.

Minor civil division areas.— At the Census of 1940, for the first time in the history of the country, area measurements were made for the primary subdivisions of the counties, i. e. civil townships or similar units. The general term "minor civil divisions" is applied by the Bureau of the Census to these county subdivisions.

For decades, in connection with each decennial census of the United States, population returns have been published by minor civil divisions, and in 1930 the Bureau of the Census compiled a set of State outline maps showing these units. Similar maps were compiled covering the census of 1940 and reproductions of the 1940 maps, in a reduced size, are included in this report.

The wide use made of the State minor civil division maps for plotting census statistics and other data stimulated an active demand for area figures in order that densities could be computed.[2] The complete collection of county and city maps showing civil units on file in the Bureau of the Census made possible the measurement of the more than 50,000 minor civil divisions of the United States.

[2] Besides numerous verbal requests made by geographers and others that the Census Bureau undertake the measurement of minor civil division areas, this interest took definite form in the following published measurements: "Wisconsin Civil Township Land Areas Survey of the Acreages in Civil Towns 1935," The Wisconsin Blue Book 1935. Compiled by the Wisconsin Legislative Reference Library. (Madison, Wis., Democrat Printing Co., 1935), pp. 872-880; Marschner, F. O., "Land and Water Areas of Delaware," Delaware Notes, Twelfth Series, 1939, University of Delaware, Newark, Del. In addition, minor civil division areas were measured and released in manuscript form by the U.S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics, and several State and local agencies for the following States or their subdivisions: Colorado, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Virginia, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming; and parts of the States of Alabama, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Washington.

Selection of maps.—For complete coverage of the United States, the aeronautical charts prepared in 1937 by the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey were found to be the most suitable. For State maps showing counties, those released by the U. S. Geological Survey were selected. For the minor civil division measurements either the topographic quadrangles of the U. S. Geological Survey or individual county maps upon which the minor civil division boundaries had been indicated were used. The county maps varied in scale from 1:62,500 to 1:125,000. The areas of cities were measured from the cadastral maps on file showing the municipal limits. Where such maps were not available the limits of the municipality were indicated upon county maps and the measurements made therefrom.

Limits of the United States.—The next step in the measurement project was to determine the outer limits of the United States, that is, to decide which waters adjacent to the States should be included or excluded. No definite rule had been followed by the Bureau of the Census in the past, each case apparently being determined upon its own merits. Obviously in setting these limits the coastal water could not be confined to a 3-mile limit nor could the legal limits of a State at the time of its admission to the Union be used. There was also a question as to the sounds, bays, and lakes which should or should not be included. The solution of this complicated problem of delimiting coastal or Great Lakes water was obtained by the following special adaptations of the principles used by S. W. Boggs in determining the territorial waters of the United States:[3]

(1) Where the coast line is regular, it was followed directly unless there were offshore islands within 10 nautical miles;

(2) Where embayments occur having headlands of less than 10 and more than 1 nautical mile in width, straight lines connecting the headlands set the limits; however, the coast line was followed if the indentation of the embayment was so shallow that its water area was less than the area of a semicircle drawn using the said straight line as a diameter;

(3) In cases where there are two or more islands less than 10 and more than 1 nautical mile from shore, they were connected by a straight line or lines and other straight lines drawn to the shore from the nearest point on each island.

Problems pertaining to the treatment of inland water required solutions in harmony with those for coastal and Great Lakes water and for land. This was necessary since the outer limits of inland water are either conterminous with the inner limits of coastal or Great Lakes water, with the outer limits of the United States, or with the limits of land. To meet these problems for inland water, the same rules were used. However, a limit of 1 rather than 10 nautical miles was substituted. The application of these principles along the coast of the United States is illustrated by map I showing the limits of the United States.

Definition of land and water areas.—Land was defined to include: Dry land and land temporarily or partially covered by water, such as marshland, swamps, and river flood plains;[4] streams, sloughs, estuaries, and canals less than one-eighth of a statute mile in width; and lakes, reservoirs, and ponds having less than 40 acres of area.

Inland water was defined to include: Permanent inland water surface, such as lakes, reservoirs, and ponds having 40 acres or more of area; streams, sloughs, estuaries, and canals one-eighth of a statute mile or more in width; deeply indented embayments and sounds and other coastal water behind or sheltered by headlands or islands separated by less than 1 nautical mile of water; and islands having less than 40 acres of area. These definitions were in terms of practical limits for planimeter measurement when working on maps with scales varying from 1:62,500 to 1:125,000.

Technique of measurement.—The total area of the United States was computed by using the aeronautical charts of the U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey on a scale of 1:500,000 and the Smithsonian geographical tables, adjusted to conform to the current legal ratio of 39.37 inches to the meter, which gave the values of all areas of 30 minutes on a side which comprise the United States total. Those parts of the United States which did not cover a 30-minute area were measured by planimeter.

For the individual States, the same method was used as for the United States and the State areas were then adjusted to the established United States total.

The counties were measured by planimeter, using U. S. Geological Survey State maps on a scale of 1:500,000. Each measurement was done in original and independent duplicate, and operators were required to encircle each area three times and take three consecutive readings before raising the tracer needle of their instruments. If the original and duplicate readings varied by more than 3 percent the areas were recomputed. These county values were then adjusted to the adjusted State areas.

The minor civil divisions were either measured by planimeter, using county maps, or scaled by ruler in those portions of the country having essentially rectangular civil subdivisions and covered by township and range surveys. The sum totals of the minor civil division areas of each county were then adjusted to the adjusted county total. The inland water area value of a minor civil division was adjusted by applying the same factor as had been used to secure the adjusted total county area.

All incorporated places having 1,000 or more population were measured unless a map showing the boundaries of the municipality could not be obtained, in which case the area was secured from local sources. For 19 places no maps, plats, or local information regarding area could be secured. The area measurements for places of 5,000 or more population were checked with reports secured from local officials and, if differences existed, agreement as to the figure to be used was reached through correspondence.

The fallacy inherent in a United States area obtained by summing the minor civil division areas, as measured on miscellaneous large-scale maps, is the certainty of duplication and omission in the map coverage. For example, if a given county is accurately covered by topographic quadrangles, there is no assurance that the boundaries of the adjoining counties, which should match exactly, do so when shown on other less accurate maps. Furthermore, there is an unaccountable and disturbing variation in the placement of parallels and meridians and in some instances in their complete omission. A combined total of these inaccuracies might be negatively or positively cumulative or perfectly compensatory. However, without question, the results would necessarily be at variance with the total area of the United States determined from maps on a uniform scale giving complete and comparable coverage.[5]

The total land and water areas for the States and counties are presented in this report in whole numbers. The areas of the minor civil divisions and incorporated places, however, are shown to an adjusted one decimal and were not forced to balance to the county totals, as too great a percentage of error occurred if measurements for such small areas were adjusted to whole numbers.

The minor civil division areas shown in this report exclude the area of any municipality of 1,000 or more population located therein. In cases where a municipality is coextensive with two or more minor civil divisions, the areas of the minor civil divisions do not appear in the tables, only the area of the municipality is shown. If an incorporation comprised parts of several minor civil divisions, area figures are presented for the municipality as a whole and for those parts of the minor civil divisions lying outside the incorporated place.

[4] It was decided to omit tidal flats, even though these appear on pilot charts and some of the older U. S. Geological Survey topographic quadrangles, and to use the coast line (mean high tide) shown on the maps selected for area measurement.

[5] This assumption was substantiated. The United States total obtained by summing the unadjusted minor civil division areas of all States was 3,022,158 square miles, or 229 square miles less than the total obtained by measuring the 1:500,000 U. S. Coast and Geodetic aeronautical charts. However, the process of summing the totals for individual States had a compensatory result, judging by the wide variation among the individual State totals. For Florida and Montana alone the totals were +1,184 and -1,627 square miles, respectively; 16 other States showed plus or minus variations of between 100 and 500 square miles; and for the remaining 30 States only 6 had variations of less than 10 square miles. As would be expected these variations were lowest for those States completely covered by topographic quadrangles.

Comparison with previous areas.—The new area measurements for the United States as a whole vary only slightly from the previously published figures. The difference is due primarily to the determination of the outer limits of the United States, the improvement in mapping, and the fact that certain bodies of water included in the previous measurements were omitted under the principles adopted.

The total United States area shows a decrease of 4,402 square miles, and the land area shows an increase of 3,352 square miles when compared with formerly published figures.

Measurements for the United States and its Territories and Possessions.—Table I gives the total, land, and inland water area for the United States and its Territories and Possessions. Continental United States includes the 48 States and the District of Columbia.

Area measurements for the Territories and Possessions, by minor civil divisions, are presented in detailed tables 5 to 11. For Guam and Puerto Rico, measurements of the minor civil divisions were not computed as the maps on file did not show the limits of these units.

Geographic divisions.—The areas of the geographic divisions of the United States are given in table II, which also shows the average size of a State in each geographic division.

Water other than inland water.—Much of the water adjacent to the States and falling under their jurisdiction does not belong to any particular county, and the State area includes only the water which could be assigned to the counties and subdivisions of the counties which, under the definition adopted by the Bureau of the Census, is known as "inland water." The water exclusive of inland water is shown by the principal bodies of water in each State in table IV.

The State of Michigan has 38,575 square miles of the 74,364 square miles of water other than inland water.

Size of counties.—The number of counties in specified area groups is given in table V. The average size of a county is approximately 1,000 square miles. However, if the counties are arranged in order according to size, the median county, that is, the county in the middle of the series, has an area of 616 square miles.

[1] Includes Baltimore city, Md.; the District of Columbia; St. Louis city, Mo.; and 24 independent cities in Virginia.
[2] Includes part of Yellowstone National Park.

The three largest counties in the United States are San Bernardino County, Calif., with 20,131 square miles; Coconino County, Ariz., with 18,573 square miles; and Nye County, Nev., with 18,064 square miles.

When county government was first established in this country, lack of transportation facilities necessitated the formation of small units. Later, the original counties were broken up in many cases into smaller counties, but even this division did not sufficiently provide for local administration and there now exist 39 counties having two or more county seats. In these counties the functions of government are performed in two localities although in some cases the records are filed at only one county seat.

Incorporated places.—Just as wide extremes exist in the areas of the counties of the United States, so is there a variation in the areas of the incorporated municipalities, such units ranging in size from 0.1 square mile to 440.3 square miles. In a number of States, either by general acts, special laws, or by power given to the counties, units can be incorporated irrespective of size. In other States, limitations are placed on the size of areas which can be incorporated.

Incorporated places are of four types according to the forms of State government: (1) Municipalities which have no functional relationship to the county government; (2) municipalities which have both a municipal and a county form of government; (3) municipalities which do not participate in the government of the civil divisions of the counties; and (4) municipalities which do participate in the government of the civil divisions of the counties.

Table VI shows the number of municipalities in the United States classified by certain size groups.

Types of minor civil divisions.—Table VII shows the number and kind of primary county subdivisions (minor civil divisions) for which separate statistics are collected by the Bureau of the Census. In addition to the subdivisions shown there are thousands of school and other taxation units for which separate census figures are not published. Where more than one type of primary subdivision exists in a county, the Bureau of the Census uses the more stable subdivision, as only in this way is it possible to obtain comparable statistics from decade to decade.

[1]Land area is defined to include: Dry land and land temporarily or partially covered by water, such as marshland, swamps, and river flood plains; streams, sloughs, estuaries, and canals less than one-eighth of a statute mile in width; and lakes, reservoirs and ponds having less than 40 acres of area.

[2]Inland water is defined to include: Permanent inland water surface, such as lakes, reservoirs and ponds having 40 acres or more of area; streams, sloughs, estuaries, and canals one-eighth of a statute mile or more in width; deeply indented embayments and sounds, and other coastal waters behind or sheltered by headlands or islands separated by less than one nautical mile of water; and islands having less than 40 acres of area. This inland water excludes 74,364 square miles of water which consists of deeply indented embayments and sounds, and other coastal waters lying between the outer limits set for inland water and behind or sheltered by headlands or islands separated by less than 10 nautical miles of water; table IV shows in detail such waters for each state.
